CODEWAY 2021

PRELIMINARY OVERVIEW ON FIRST PHASE OF PROJECT

Important ideas and practical programs, to be discussed or presented to the protagonists of the world of development cooperation.

This is the goal of the web conferences that Codeway intends to organize during the digital session in early December 2021. The virtual space, which will prepare the ground for the physical one to be held in May, will serve as an opportunity to launch themes and practical developments to be explored in the digital experience.

For this reason, the chosen format includes one or two presentations at an international level, which will then be discussed, integrated and/or appreciated by a wide audience of discussants, all selected from the main players in the international world of development.

What post-Covid health Cooperation? What funds has the European Union made available for development policies? What do the new World Bank guidelines on sustainability envisage?

These are just some of the issues and themes that will be put on the table.

PLENARY

Covid, sustainability and the SDGs, the new paradigms of International Development Cooperation.

After the passage of Covid on the planet, many wonder what the dividend of international cooperation will be, and whether talking about cooperation still makes sense. Nevertheless, the challenges that emerged with Covid demonstrate how both the concept of international cooperation and that of sustainability are essential for building a safer future. This applies in healthcare and more than ever from the economic and social points of view.

Said perspective makes us better understand the choices of the European Union (which in the EU Budget 2021-2027, among the various measures, endows the Neighborhood and International Cooperation and Development Instrument with 79.5 billion euros) or the World Bank who has already made it known that the sustainability (environmental, economic and social) of projects and works will be a basic requirement for obtaining funding or carrying out works.

Precisely for this reason and to achieve the objectives contained in the 2030 Agenda, today more than in the past, it becomes essential for the profit and non-profit sectors to find a common language and a common ground to coordinate and hybridize their interactions.

What ecological transition in developing Countries?

The issue of ecological transition is at the center of the European debate and of the post-Covid recovery plans (including economic ones). But what is happening in developing countries?

The concept of transition is applicable to both energy and agriculture and therefore ranges from renewable energy to the circular economy.

What synergies to create between profit and non-profit to push the transition?

Africa: the urge is focus on Training

The trends of demographic growth in Africa continent and the pace of economic growth and industrialization require an in-depth reflection on the need to culturally and professionally train millions of young people who - in the coming years and up to the end of the century - will look into the world of work. Whether these young people decide to stay in their countries of origin or whether they decide to migrate in search of fortune, the ability to offer them training opportunities is fundamental. It is for the countries of departure (engaged in industrial development that needs skills) and it is for any countries of arrival, which, affected by phenomena of demographic contraction, may need people with defined professional skills. Training is a theme and a terrain in which profit and non-profit can not only meet, but rather collaborate for mutual benefit.

Agriculture and hunger: why the development of agriculture in Africa affects the entire planet.

In view of the recent ratification of the Africa Continental Free Trade Area (AfCTA), which potentially makes Africa the largest free trade area in the world, the continent's agri-food sector has attracted the attention of global investors. African agriculture produces a variety of products in demand globally, including cocoa from the Ivory Coast and Ghana, tea from Kenya, maize and rice from Nigeria, vanilla from Madagascar and fruit from South Africa, to name a few.

However, the regulation of this sector cannot be left to the market alone since the development of the African agri-food sector has the potential to have an impact on the entire planet. Just look at the numbers: the sector on the continent is projected to reach a trade value of $ 1 trillion by 2030, Africa is home to 60% of the world's uncultivated arable land, and its productivity represents only about 10% of the world agricultural production. About three-quarters of Africans depend on agriculture for their livelihoods, and over 30% of the continent's income, as well as significant amounts of export and employment income, comes from agri-industry and agri-business. Developing these activities towards growth will not only increase revenues for countries, but also lift many rural citizens out of poverty, creating jobs across the continent. This is a decidedly vital element, since it is expected that young Africans will make up a quarter of the world workforce by 2050. It is equally important to guide African agricultural development so that it follows virtuous and sustainable paths, for the environment and health.

The change must go beyond the simple cultivation of the land and towards the production of products with significant added value, primarily intended for the African market. Just to give an example, 90 percent of the total income of African coffee goes to the countries of consumption, only to a residual extent to the countries where it is grown.
